Justice Neely is author of the book, How Courts Govern America, which was published by Yale University Press in 1981. In his book he advances the idea that judicial review is a democratic, institutional compensation for the structural defects of the legislative branch and the bureaucratic self-dealing of the executive branch of government.

Neely's writing is based on his experiences as a state legislator and jurist. He was elected to the West Virginia House of Delegates in 1971 and he became a member of that state's Supreme Court of Appeals in 1973 at the age of 31.

He practiced law alone in Fairmont, West Virginia for four years after military service in Viet Nam. He earned his A.B. in economics at Dartmouth in 1964 and his law degree at Yale in 1967.

Neely is Professor of Economics at the University of Charleston, and he has been an active businessman for many years.

In addition to his book, Neely has published numerous articles in Juris Doctor magazine and is author of a law review article on economics. His most recent article entitled, "The Politics of Crime," appeared in the August 1982 issue of Atlantic Monthly.
