On this Annual Law Day we welcome you to the School of Law. We believe that you will not only enjoy the fellowship with one another but that you will derive much pleasure and benefit from renewing your association with the School and learning something of its present work and our hopes for the future. While we are mindful of the contribution this School has made during its long and notable history to the development of our State, we also realize that the Law School must do its part in meeting the increasing demands brought about by the complexities of modern civilization upon law and its institutions. Changes in the curriculum have to be made from time to time in order to equip the future members of the profession for useful careers at the bar. Important as this training may be as the primary function of a law school, it will not suffice to discharge our duty to preserve and ever improve a system of social control through law in order that the ends of justice may be more nearly reached. A step in the right direction has recently been made with the establishment by the Board of Regents of the Georgia Institute of Law and Government as an integral part of the School of Law. Designed to make an intensive study of law in action and fitting theory to facts, the Institute will develop a practicable laboratory of law where needed improvements in the procedural and substantive law of Georgia can be accomplished. Your support and that of various branches of the State Government, the organized bar and other interested agencies and groups will go far toward making the work of the Institute successful. There has long been a need in Georgia for such an organization and it has many potentialities for good. In working toward more effective legal solutions of modern problems in these changing times, all of us through the Institute of Law and Government here at The University of Georgia can make a substantial contribution to the majesty and power of law and justice.

J. ALTON HOSCH,
Dean
