NEW STACK POLICY!

by Jacobina A. Watson

With increasing frequency, the books in the library are being returned with tears, stains, spots, parasites, pressed flowers, hairs, and other assorted damage that decreases the lifetime of our collection. With the limited budget that we already operate under, we can no longer afford to have the law library books open to such mayhem.

After Spring Break, law students will no longer be allowed to enter the stacks, or to check out books. If a third-year desires to read a limited number of pages in a particular volume, he or she may request that the desk assistant retrieve that volume. Upon a proper inspection of the student's credentials and reasons for requesting the book, the student may be allowed to read only the selected pages. A glass case will be used to house the books, with the desk assistant turning the pages on request. Second and First-Years may not use books in the library. Except for Shepard's volumes, which are open for your enjoyment.

In addition, drinks and food are no longer allowed within 100 yards of the law library.

ON-LINE CATALOG: CONTEST ERROR

by Whoever

It was recently discovered that the new on-line catalog was named in error. Previously, it had been reported that the name "GAVEL" had been chosen, but because of a clerical error, the actual name was misreported. The computer system will be renamed "GALVIN."

STUDENT FEEDBACK

by Sam O. Lovett

As part of a new feature intended to make the decision making process more of a two way street, the library newsletter will include a new feedback column each month. Each month we will ask a fellow student for suggestions to improve the library. This column will serve to compliment the idea book already located near the telephone.

"I think that the library needs to be open longer. Now, I am limited to 16 hours a day studying. This hardly seems fair.
