

FOREWORD

*Lindsey Cowen**

The Georgia Journal of International and Comparative Law is the brainchild of those students whose names appear on the mastheads of pages 131-32. They have planned well and worked diligently to produce this first issue and to lay a solid foundation for those to follow. The Journal is, and will continue to be, a quality publication, designed to be of value not only to the scholar and the specialist in international and comparative law, but also to the practitioner who suddenly finds himself confronted in his regular practice with these kinds of problems which are arising in Georgia with increasing frequency.

The Georgia Journal of International and Comparative Law was conceived and the preliminary work performed long before former Secretary of State Dean Rusk was designated Samuel H. Sibley Professor of International Law at the University of Georgia School of Law. The timing of the two events, however, could not have been planned more effectively. Professor Rusk's leadership in the School's programs of international and comparative law will make the Georgia Journal of International and Comparative Law exceptionally attractive to distinguished authors in these fields; I confidently predict that within a very short period of time, this Journal will be pre-eminent in its field.

We owe these young men a great debt of gratitude. I congratulate them for their initiative, their determination and their high sense of professional responsibility.
