

NOTE FROM THE EDITOR

On September 18, 2017 practitioners, academics, and students met at the University of Georgia School of Law for the 2017 Conference entitled “The Next Generation of International Trade Agreements.” The discussion centered around the future of international trade agreements. During the first panel, the discussion focused on what should be on the negotiating table as we determine where to go after Brexit and the 2016 U.S. presidential elections. During the second panel, a debate ensued about the role of the World Trade Organization and what sort of agreement the WTO should build. Over lunch, the conversation revolved around the effects of these trade agreements on some of the largest corporations that all have a strong Atlanta presence. Finally, during the last panel, we heard what issues we could address with new agreements. The Journal is honored to continue this conversation in this issue, which will feature the work of these scholars.
