Earlier this year, students and professors in Georgia Law’s Appellate Litigation Clinic had a profound and lasting impact on a client’s life when President Barack Obama granted a clemency petition they prepared.

The clinic first began work on Georgia native Steven B. Boyd’s case in 2013 when the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 11th Circuit referred the matter. Then-students Anne Horn Baroody (J.D.’14) and Bryan W. Lutz (J.D.’14) initially litigated the matter before the 11th Circuit, which remanded the case to the District Court for the Southern District of Georgia to decide a procedural question. After litigation on that question proved unsuccessful, then-students Elliott R. Gillooly (J.D.’15) and Matthew C. Mikkelsen (J.D.’15) and current third-year students Elliott C. Ream and Taylor Strickland prepared the clemency petition.

Boyd’s story exemplifies the importance of sentencing reform efforts and having committed legal advocates representing indigent prisoners, according to clinic supervisors Erica J. Hashimoto and Thomas V. Burch.

“The clinic was appointed to represent Mr. Boyd in habeas proceedings and pardon came as a result of a clemency petition filed on his behalf,” the professors said. “Prior to the involvement of the clinic, Mr. Boyd was representing himself as he did not have the means to retain private counsel.”

Boyd’s story exemplifies the importance of sentencing reform efforts and having committed legal advocates representing indigent prisoners, according to clinic supervisors Erica J. Hashimoto and Thomas V. Burch.

Boyd’s story exemplifies the importance of sentencing reform efforts and having committed legal advocates representing indigent prisoners, according to clinic supervisors Erica J. Hashimoto and Thomas V. Burch.

“Mr. Boyd met all of the president’s conditions for clemency. No violent history before being incarcerated. No violent history while incarcerated, and he was serving an overly harsh sentence for a nonviolent crime. He deserved sentencing relief,” Burch added.

When Boyd is released, he will have served more than 18 years for crimes that under today’s federal sentencing guidelines would have resulted in a maximum sentence of 15 years and 8 months.

He plans to live with his daughter and two grandsons, who, as the daughter explained in a letter to President Obama, “love him dearly and cry every visitation because he is not leaving with us.”

Boyd will officially be released in September.